4. The ERDA team noted a number of problems, and they and Members of the Committee suggested measures that might be taken to improve collection and reporting. Mr. Eisenstein noted that field personnel frequently had difficulty judging the significance and pertinence of information that was or could become available. Many Embassies have no personnel technically trained and knowledgeable on nuclear matters; potential reporters had not been briefed; and adequate briefing and reference materials often are not available locally. Mr. Thro, State, commented that the HSC nth country task team has talked about the desirability of some sort of collection model, perhaps an indicator list telling collectors what kinds of things to watch for at various stages in the country's development of a nuclear capability. Mr. Eisenstein observed that an informal list of this sort was available to a key reporter in one country visited, and that the latter had found it invaluable. He suggested that indicator lists could usefully be sent to other collectors in other places. Additional suggestions discussed very briefly included the provision of better reference and briefing materials to the field; the possible circulation of a newsletter on international nuclear developments; the possibility of an ERDA orientation course for the officials from other agencies who are assigned to "nth countries"; and the desirability of assignment to key countries of ERDA or other technically-trained personnel.
